In this dissertation, we explore the relationship between energy efficiency and self-adaptability of software systems. We distinguish between architectural solutions and infrastructural solutions. As for the former, we use software architecture as the main instrument to carry over energy-related design decisions. As for the latter, we evaluate the effectiveness of optimization algorithms and software-defined infrastructures.